Why Do Grads Don Caps and Gowns?

Graduation ceremonies are steeped in tradition, the most noticeable of which may be the caps and gowns worn by students on hand to receive their degrees. This attire likely dates back to 12th century Europe, when students would wear hoods and gowns that resembled those worn by their teachers, who were members of the clergy. According to Colorado State University, in 1321 a statute of the University of Coimbra in Portugal declared that all "Doctors, Licentiatees, and Bachelors" wear gowns. That means that the mandatory graduation gown is on the cusp of celebrating its 700th anniversary. Hoods, caps and gowns not only signified a certain status of the students wearing them, but they also served a more practical purpose, helping to keep students warm in the unheated buildings where they were being taught. Ironically, many modern graduates, particularly those whose graduation ceremonies are held outdoors, may lament that their caps and gowns make them feel hot.

FYI

Which Side of a Graduation Cap Does the Tassel Go On?

It all depends on what degree you're getting. Students earning a high school or undergraduate degree start with the tassel on the right. After you've actually graduated, you move it to the left. Often during a graduation ceremony (probably after diplomas have been handed out), a presider will tell everyone it's time to shift their tassels from right to left.

If you need a handy mnemonic device to help you nail that protocol, just remember that the right side is the right side—and when you move it to the left, you've officially left school. But once you have an undergraduate de-
