A World Of Wonder Awaits At Camp

The dog days of summer are almost here. It's an anticipated occasion for kids and a time of anxiety for some parents, but it doesn't have to be stress-inducing. With summer camps, families can enjoy the best of both worlds — activities that keep kids engaged and occupied while giving parents much-needed child care.

We hope you flip through the pages of this guide and find a camp that suits the needs of your children. Areas of interest include arts and crafts, dance, gymnastics, music, outdoor activities, photography, sailing, sports, theater and more.

Camps fill spots quickly, so don't forget to register soon. Best of luck finding a camp that helps your children forge new friendships and experience hobbies both new and old. ■

Annapolis School Of Seamanship Offers Something For Everyone

By Mark Patton

mark@severnaparkvoice.com

If warm weather, water and being out on a boat sound like an ideal way to spend some summer days, the Annapolis School of Seamanship offers a variety of courses tailored for the new boater to the professional mariner.

The school, located in Annapolis' Maritime Republic of Eastport, is currently gearing up to host one of its more popular courses, the Jr. Captains Course. The five-day course is available for kids ages 11-15.

Upon successful completion of the course, students will have confidence operating small, single outboard powerboats. In addition to earning a Maryland safe boating certificate, students will also be eligible to continue to the Jr. Captains Level 2 course.

"You don't have to come from a boating family to become a boater," said Captain John Martino, Annapolis School of Seamanship founder and CEO.

The Chesapeake Bay and its tributaries contain more than 11,600 miles of shoreline, making the area an ideal one to hone watercraft skills and knowledge.

"There is a lifetime of adventure and cruising on the Chesapeake Bay," Martino said.

Kids in the course spend a majority of their week on the boat.

"You can't learn how to drive a boat in the classroom," said Kaitlyn Bize, program coordinator at Annapolis School of Seamanship.

During the course, attendees will learn safety, boat handling and steering, docking, fueling, navigation, knots, weather awareness, man overboard training and more.

Students will even get to try their hand on a slalom course with a boat and learn anchoring skills.

Bize noted the satisfaction she gets watching the kids transform from cautious on the boat to confident independence on the water.

"That's the biggest thing I see in the kids is that sense of accomplishment," Bize said.

Each course is taught by a licensed captain and there are three time slots to choose from for the Monday to Friday course. The Jr. Captains Course is slated to begin the week of June 19 and course offerings run through most of September. Each boat consists of four students and a licensed captain instructor. For those who hope to attend the course with friends, it's possible by calling the school directly to sign up and request a boat together.

"We hear stories a lot where kids who have been through the Jr. Captains program are the ones who are helping their parents," Martino said. "I think the parents really appreciate that."

Martino said everything the school does is anchored around safety.

"We prioritize safety, fun and learning," Martino said. "If they have fun in a safe environment, they learn."

The Jr. Captains Level 2 course is aimed for those ages 12-16 who have already completed the first course. Students who complete this level will upgrade their certification card from class A to class 1, which allows for a larger vessel, and it upgrades the approved area of operation to bays and sounds.

Students in this course will learn skills such as fueling, checking oil, trim and weight distribution, emergency stops, navigation and chart plotting, and identifying buoyage and other markers on the water.

This summer, the Annapolis School of Seamanship is also introducing a level 3 course, which will focus on water sports.

Martino said kids who go through all levels can do an internship at the school to learn more about the maritime field, and they're in the initial phases of offering apprenticeships.

Summer fun with Annapolis School of Seamanship isn't limited to just the younger ones, though.

"One of the fastest growing programs we have here is the Women at the Wheel program," Martino said.

This program — where participants will learn water safety, radio communications, knots and line handling, docking, operating at speed and weather — is geared to women who prefer to learn boating skills around other females.

Other courses offered at Annapolis School of Seamanship run the gamut from general boat operator and docking classes to electrical, diesel, navigation and weather courses.

Annapolis School of Seamanship only employs licensed captains who have completed background checks. The school is also a registered Maryland camp.

For more information or to register for a course, visit www.annapolischoolofseamanship.com or call 410-263-8848. ■
